Touchstones

Creed Fields

	PRYIA CHEN The hacker friend, known for years. One of maybe two people he trusts without reservation. She has stopped asking follow-up questions, which worries him more than if she pushed. BISHOP Not a warm dog. Trained, controlled, present. Since Rosa's death he alerts on things in no K9 manual - a flat, dead stillness aimed at a person or a room. He is never wrong. DARA SILVA Rosa's younger sister. The official story never sat right with her either. Ezekiel checks in on her more than he would admit.	CONCEPT Still dragging a corkboard and a dead K9 handler's dog through cases the department wants buried - and he's rarely wrong about what's underneath.

History

Fourteen years on the force, mostly homicide, and Ezekiel was good at it - not flashy, just relentless. He didn't let go of threads other detectives filed and forgot. That is what got him: a string of deaths written up as unrelated - overdoses, accidents, one ruled suicide he still doesn't believe. He pulled the thread anyway and found all of them connected to a name that kept not existing on paper. His captain told him to drop it. He didn't. Six months later he was out. Official story: conduct unbecoming. Unofficial story: somebody above his pay grade didn't want the questions asked.

He has run his own PI shop since, taking the cases nobody else wants - missing persons that don't add up, deaths closed too fast, families who know something is wrong and can't get anyone in a uniform to listen. He has a corkboard that would make a task force uncomfortable, red string included, and he is right often enough that it has stopped being funny.

He smokes constantly. Not really for the nicotine - for the ritual. Lighting up is punctuation: the two seconds he allows himself between finding out something terrible and having to do something about it.
