CONCEPT

Ezekiel Delacroix: the ex-cop New Orleans forgot to stop, still dragging a corkboard and a dead K9 handler’s dog through cases the department wants buried — and he’s rarely wrong about what’s underneath.

AMBITION

Find the name behind the case that ended his career — the one that isn’t supposed to exist on paper — and finally make it stick to something real.

DESIRE

Close this case clean, for once, without anyone else paying for what he didn’t catch in time.

Specialties: Investigation (Cold Cases — his specific talent is reopening cases everyone else already closed, finding the thread nobody else bothered to pull.) · Streetwise (Informants — years of cultivating contacts on both sides of the law; people talk to him who wouldn’t talk to a badge.) · Occult (Louisiana Folklore — fits the New Orleans setting hard — rougarou, hoodoo practice, swamp legends, the specific regional supernatural knowledge base a local PI would actually accumulate, rather than generic occult trivia.)

EDGES & PERKS

GLOBAL ACCESS

APTITUDE

Digital fluency: hacking, surveillance, data access most people can’t touch.

↳ ↳ Ezekiel can call in a favor for something beyond his own reach (real-time tracking, a harder system, faster turnaround).

TOUCHSTONES

Pryia Chen
the hacker friend, known for years, predates whatever Ezekiel’s become. Sharp, a little reckless herself, one of maybe two people he trusts without reservation. She doesn’t fully know what he’s chasing, but she’s stopped asking follow-up questions, which worries him more than if she pushed. (Also his in-fiction source for the Global Access Edge — the “who’s actually doing the hacking” behind the mechanics.)

Bishop
Bishop is not a warm dog. He’s trained, controlled, and doesn’t do affection so much as proximity — he sits near Ezekiel, watches doors, doesn’t relax even at home. What he does do is react. Somewhere between Rosa’s death and Ezekiel picking him up, Bishop started alerting on things that aren’t in any K9 training manual — a flat, dead stillness aimed at a person or a room, ears back, no bark, just refusal to get closer. He’s never wrong. He also can’t tell Ezekiel what he’s found, only that something’s there, which means Bishop is an early-warning system with no explanation attached — useful and deeply unsettling in equal measure.

Dara Silva
Rosa’s younger sister. Doesn’t know the specifics of how Rosa really died, only that the official story never sat right with her either. Ezekiel checks in on her more than he’d admit to anyone, partly out of guilt, partly because she’s the last living connection to someone he couldn’t save.

BACKGROUND & NOTES

Fourteen years on the force, mostly homicide, and Ezekiel was good at it — not flashy, just relentless. He didn’t let go of threads other detectives filed and forgot. That’s what got him: a string of deaths written up as unrelated — overdoses, “accidents,” one ruled suicide he still doesn’t believe. He pulled the thread anyway and found all of them connected to a name that kept not existing on paper — no address, no priors, no paper trail a person should have. His captain told him to drop it. He didn’t. Six months later he was out. Official story: conduct unbecoming. Unofficial story: somebody above his pay grade didn’t want the questions asked.

He’s run his own PI shop since, taking the cases nobody else wants — missing persons that don’t add up, deaths closed too fast, families who know something’s wrong and can’t get anyone in a uniform to listen. He’s got a corkboard that would make a task force uncomfortable, red string included, and he’s right often enough that it’s stopped being funny. He’s the guy who calls something a conspiracy half as a joke, three drinks in — and turns out to be dead serious and unfortunately correct six weeks later.

He smokes constantly. Not really for the nicotine — for the ritual. Lighting up is punctuation: the two seconds he allows himself between finding out something terrible and having to actually do something about it.

Tone: Worn-down conviction, gallows humor, a man who ran out of capacity for surprise a long time ago and kept working anyway.
